I. DRIVING FORCES

Polarity: GREEN · Average score: 8.6 (High)

Authoritarian

Score: 8/10 - High

The writer believes in, practices and advocates unquestioning obedience to authority rather than individual freedom of judgment and action. He is imbued with the ability to lay down the law and see that it is carried out. He is quite capable of throwing his weight about and insisting that others fulfill their obligations to the letter. He gives orders instead of asking; his instructions sound harsh and lacking in courtesy. He hardly praises but frequently criticizes and belittles. He tries too hard, most of the time, and creates his own resistance. No matter how unintentional such behavior may be on his part, it tends to offend those toward whom it is directed. People resent being forced and driven and dislike the person who tries to dominate their lives.

The writer will not adapt himself. Instead, he expects that others should conform to him. He wants the rules he has laid down to be followed. With his dictatorial attitude, he often antagonizes people and wounds the feelings of others. He lays down the law when compromise would be essential. When he senses he is not getting through, he will step up the pressure. He is determined that other people will do things his way, or else! It becomes an issue of will. Reasoning with him is not possible. He wants his own way and that is all that is on his mind. The minute he loses authority on the job or at home, he will turn moody and discontent or he may become totally disinterested. It is not his nature to submit.

The writer will take orders willingly from very few people because he believes very few people are superior to him. As an employer, he tends to be bossy. He will insist that his orders and instructions are carried out immediately and to the letter. He will not stand for disobedience or defiance and becomes angry when his discipline is thwarted. Others may find out the hard way that he does not like to be contradicted, especially in public.

The writer is power-oriented and sees the world divided into the weak and the strong. He, himself, identifies with authority figures. He is submissive toward superiors and contemptuous and dictatorial toward inferiors. He insists on strict obedience from subordinates. He may be hostile to members of minority groups.

The writer adheres strictly to conventional values. He finds it difficult to tolerate uncertainty.

The writer would function best in a position of management or command. He is a natural in sales, law enforcement or the military where force is right and necessary.

Ego Needs

Score: 9/10 - High

The writer thrives on praise, acknowledgment and compliments as others show their approval of him. He is happier when he is talking about himself and his plans than about anything or anybody else. He needs constant ego boosts. His self esteem depends on outside approval and he can lose it instantly with direct reproach.

He worries very much what people are saying about him and how he appears to them. If they praise him, he will strive extra hard for a fine performance. With acknowledgment, his self-esteem is confirmed and he feels worthwhile. Flattery, adulation and compliments are all ways to his heart. (He has an inner desire to be noticed, and often, for instance, he puts five dollars in the collection plate, he wants everyone to know it is a five-dollar bill not a one-dollar bill.) Lacking praise and encouragement, the writer may withdraw from whatever he is involved in. He is afraid of making a poor showing and being ridiculed. Comparisons are especially aggravating to him. If he is criticized, particularly in front of a group, he becomes extremely distressed. Being criticized to him means losing face and destroys his image.

The writer prefers friends who have prestige and travel in the right social circles. He probably looks for a mate who enhances his position in life. He tends to seek the company of attractive, efficient people who can be a credit to him and build up his ego and status in life. (The writer most likely has two behaviors: a likable, personable one for company, especially if it includes new people to impress, and the other egocentric one for the family who may be left bewildered by his inconsistent attitude.) When his needs are not met, he can become destructive in words and attitude towards those receiving the acknowledgment.

The writer enjoys things that are impressive, like a stately home or a luxury car. He likes to own things that others don't have and he is pleased to show them off. He likes his name on his belongings and well-known store labels on the things he buys. For that reason, he is apt to splurge on things that others will feel are unneeded luxuries, but which are very necessary to him. Expensive items or high-priced clothes help him to feel his importance. (So important is prestige that he might be tempted to accept a job with a lower salary if it gives him a better office and a more impressive title.)

The writer lets others know of his accomplishments. Whatever happens to him is special. He speaks of what he is going to do and frequently puts himself on the spot so that he actually does have to accomplish remarkable things in order to save face.

He likes to feel that he has new ideas first. The best way to introduce a topic is to leave a few casual remarks with him to think about and later request his opinion on the subject.

The writer's love for an audience draws him into the entertainment world. He could perform as lecturer, receptionist, professional athlete or in sales.

Need For Acceptance

Score: 9/10 - High

The writer wants to be loved and accepted by everyone; he can be deeply hurt if others resist or are indifferent to his expectations. He prefers individuals who are warm and quick to demonstrate that they approve of him. Consideration, encouragement and acceptance are necessary for his well-being. When others demonstrate that they like him, he is relieved and receives a measure of security. He feels uncomfortable with people who are cold and detached because they do not fulfill his need for reassurance. If he cannot be accepted and liked, he wants people to feel at least sorry for him.

The writer wants someone to lean on and does not enjoy doing things by himself. He does not feel complete without someone else around. Since his need for acceptance is so great, he tries to accept everyone else around, too.

The writer defers to other people and is willing to let them have their way. In fact, so great is his desire to please and his fear of being rejected, that he is easily taken advantage of. He may frequently find himself doing things he really does not want to do just because he is afraid of upsetting another individual.

The writer tries to live up to the role others expect of him and goes to great lengths to avoid criticism and disapproval. When he encounters a rebuff in spite of all his efforts, he has little to fall back on and can be crushed. He is quick to misinterpret detachment as rejection, even when this is not the case.

Any sign of acceptance gives him superficial reassurance, but deep down it meets with disbelief and evokes feelings of distrust and fear. He can never really believe that he is liked and appreciated and he always feels inadequate. Basically, he runs the treadmill. He reaches out for affection, but the chances for satisfaction are slim. The insecurity that creates the need interferes with its gratification.

The writer's pattern of living has serious flaws. Firstly, his need is overpowering, requiring more and more people to satisfy it. Secondly, since he is constantly clamoring for approval from others, he is not living his own life. He has to do what will please others and ignore his own wishes, aspirations and desires. Consequently, his energies and resources are not used to develop his own potential.

Aspirations

Score: 8/10 - High

The writer has an ardent desire for advancement. He longs for personal improvement, achievement or gain. His aspirations are expansive. He is strongly motivated to achieve something worthwhile that will gain him recognition and success. He is progressive in setting his goals. He is desirous of improvement, particularly self-improvement. He is alert to ways of advancing himself and to the opportunities which present themselves. He is willing to take chances, undertake the unfamiliar and sacrifice for his ambitions. He thinks in terms of advancing rather than adapting. He wants to achieve much in order to improve his position and raise his station in life. He thinks in bigger terms. He anticipates how what he is doing in the moment will relate itself to the fulfillment of his aims. He mentally envisions the fulfillment of his desires. For him, in a sense, the image of what he wants to create is his reality.

With self-esteem high, the writer has large ego demands and a strong need for recognition. He will strive hard for reinforcement of his self-esteem.

With self-esteem very high but without supportive traits, the writer has lofty aspirations but is unable to sustain such exalted goals. He procrastinates or avoids undertaking the unfamiliar. Through exaggeration he wants to cover up his lack of inner assurance.

Conformity

Score: 9/10 - High

The writer acts in accordance with established rules, customs and conventions. He conforms outwardly, even though he may not necessarily believe in the opinions expressed or the behavior displayed. He wants supportive identification with a group, however small. He has found this to be the easiest and most expedient way to approach life. He selects groups because they share his attitude. The group, in turn, helps develop and sustain his individual point of view. He adopts entirely the kind of personality that fits the opinions of the group because being isolated from a group creates anxiety.

The writer avoids stress by identifying with the group and by accepting their attitudes. He observes rules and regulations and follows fads and accepted trends in thinking, dress and behavior. He becomes exactly as all others are because he is afraid to do otherwise. He may want to be independent and do things on his own but his need for approval prevents him from doing so.

Proper performance and demeanor are important since the writer unconsciously rates himself by what others think of him. His self esteem rises or falls with their approval or disapproval. He wants to “do right” and “be right.” Behavior that is approved by the group gives him a sense of security. He pursues “in” activities and plays the role that is expected of him. He adapts himself to circumstances, situations and other people in order to fit in. And he conforms to these standards not only in his actions but even in his thoughts and feelings. He presumes that rules are more important than personalities and feels secure by not behaving in noticeably different ways. In the face of nonconforming behavior, he feels lost. He tends to consider less conforming individuals as rule breakers and when he sees others flaunting customs, he becomes upset.

The writer thinks in traditional ways. He holds on to ideas he has known before without making an effort to think in new patterns. He wants to perpetuate what is familiar and approved. His role in his reference group determines to a large extent his conception of himself. If he is fully accepted by everyone, he gains confidence and feels assured. If he is only partially accepted, he suffers self-doubt. If he is rejected, he may experience intense anxiety. In his aspirations, the writer stays with current opportunities. He is content with where he is as long as it offers a minimum of security. The stronger the evidence of conformity, the less willing he is to try the unfamiliar or meet somebody he does not know. So long as his relationships involve people who behave in familiar ways, he feels safe.

Important! The stronger the evidence of conformity, the less willing he is to try the unfamiliar or meet somebody he does not know. So long as his relationships involve people who behave in familiar ways, he feels safe.

II. INTELLECT

Polarity: GREEN · Average score: 7.8 (High)

Thinking effectiveness

Score: 8/10 - High

The writer applies conscious, directed thought. When working on a problem or task, he focuses all his mental energy without deviating from his thought processes.

He consciously processes new ideas or challenges through an active thought process. Whenever he is faced with a new situation, he is likely to take the time to think it through.

He is able to learn new concepts and finds pleasure and challenge in considering the theoretical aspects of a subject.

Mentally alert, he is able to resolve most situations through clear thinking. He is likely to be successful in any job where he has a chance to use his mind.

The writer will rarely be satisfied with routine work or with staying in a position that requires only average or less than average mental capacity.

With pressure in conspicuous places, the writer will make a special effort when he feels himself observed.

With sudden heavy pressure in middle zone downstrokes, the writer's mind will function irregularly, having surges of thought.

Mental Orientation

Score: 8/10 - High

The writer is intellectually motivated and inclined to express himself in terms of mental activity. What he accomplishes is the result of thought. He thinks dynamically and prefers to work with his mind rather than his hands. It is essential to his health and well-being that he keep his mind engaged. He will rarely be satisfied with routine work or with staying in a position that requires only average or less than average mental capacity.

The writer enjoys intellectual subjects and thrives on mental challenges. He loves intelligent discussions. He has the ability to concentrate and to think innovatively. Abstract thinking and mental pursuits are natural for him and his mind can stretch beyond the normal horizons. Unless he has a mental challenge, he feels stifled and dull and without continual mental stimulation, he is likely to become nervous and irritable.

The writer is an energetic thinker. His mind is always busy and restless. He wants to explore beyond what he already knows and he is prepared to experiment mentally. He may be the propounder of new theories. High mental energy activates his mind. It gives him drive and increases astuteness. It makes him want to tackle a job and set high goals. Additionally, it gives him an optimistic and enthusiastic outlook on life.

By nature, the writer is more likely to think than act. He does not lack physical stamina, but he has to call it up consciously and sustain it by will. He is more a thinker than a doer and is not attracted to physical labor. Physical activity does not produce the same enjoyment as mental action. Sports, physical labor, dancing, swimming or running may be done out of obligation but are a chore. Satisfaction is in mental, not physical work. He spends so much time thinking that he is likely to activate his body less than he should. He is not the type to go in for regular exercise. He would prefer to sit behind his desk rather than take off on a brisk walk or play a regular game of tennis. As a result, he is inclined to have poorer health and his recuperative powers are generally weaker. It takes him much longer to recover from exertion because mental energy cannot be restored as quickly as it is taken out. It takes at least three times as long to replenish mental energy as it does to restore physical stamina.

The writer has enough intellectual pursuits to make him an interesting person to meet. Personally, he prefers intellectual fellowship and in a relationship, he requires mental companionship more than physical presence. He needs partners who are on the same mental wavelength with whom he can discuss a wide range of topics. Because he lives in a mental world, his behavior at times may seem high-brow to more down-to-earth associates.

To the writer, love is more an idea than an emotion. It is a mental thing and he can be in love with the idea of love. He becomes intellectually rather than emotionally involved and has to be deeply stirred to begin love in ordinary terms. He has to experience a total blending of the mind and the spirit before the physical passions catch up in intensity. He requires a mental stimulus to set him off. Since the same energy that is used for mental work is used for sex, he may show only infrequent interest in actual sexual activities. This may be especially true while he is working on mentally demanding jobs. He finds his enjoyments in the mind, not in physical sensations. The writer’s aim is probably to earn a living through mental pursuits. Physical routine and manual labor are anathema to him. He can be quite practical in certain areas but he works best in the mental field. He enjoys scientific studies. Research and planning give him a feeling of being in the right place. His scholarly nature may induce him to take up a career in education.

With organizational ability, the writer may take a special interest in scientific studies. He is probably competent at extracting ideas and organizing them into an applicable pattern.

Motivation

Score: 8/10 - High

The writer aims at a lower plateau of achievement. Moderate levels of performance are acceptable to him. He engages in activity less vigorously and less efficiently. Before making a move he frequently looks for direction and he needs encouragement and supervision on difficult or long-term jobs.

Comprehension

Score: 8/10 - High

The writer is mentally astute. He has a keen mind and quick perception. He is able to grasp facts instantly and immediately understands the nature of things and situations. His assessments are instantaneous. He acquires knowledge quickly and assimilates it with what he knows in order to put it to immediate and profitable use. Labored explanations are not necessary for him; he gets the point at once and frequently grasps the whole argument before the speaker has finished the preamble. Although he moves quickly from one topic to another, it is not in a superficial way.

The writer is able to “think on his feet” and moves from one subject to another with great speed. He can outthink others and concludes, almost before the facts are in. He sums up situations swiftly and seems to have the answers before the questions are asked. Lengthy explanations make him nervous and he is irritated by people who take longer to process their thoughts. He may second-guess or try to hurry them along. Because of his perceptive mind and his desire to get to the next item, he often interrupts slower people. One of his pet phrases will be “Get to the point.”

The writer functions to advantage where time is at a premium or where fast decisions are needed. He would do well in emergency surgery, transportation, fire fighting or communication. Fast paced work gives him the feeling of being in the right place research. He is suited to farming, accounting and computer work. The educational field is excellent for him. Occupations which involve forecasting and theory will offer satisfaction, as long as they provide enough time for preparation, research and thought.

Creativity, Originality

Score: 7/10 - High

The writer is able to create without precedent and to reach conclusions that are not the norm. He probably enjoys artistic work that stirs his imagination. Music, poetry, or painting may have more than the usual appeal.

The writer shows independent judgment and high mental maturity. He has an original approach and puts his personal stamp on whatever he does. He adds creative thinking to his work. He is challenged by problems. He looks for ingenious solutions and is willing to experiment with the unknown. His creativity may be expressed in small ways or on a larger scale. Beyond personal applications, he may think up progressive schemes to increase the company's profit or lower its overhead. He may originate new product designs, an architectural drawing or a new marketing strategy. He may present old or unused materials in new and innovative forms. He has much initiative and his imagination is triggered wherever the need for new applications exists.

The writer's ability may either be used as a hobby or it may be turned to commercial use. He would probably enjoy a career in some artistic field. His need for self-expression may find an outlet in painting, writing, or, perhaps, music. With his talent, the writer could create something for practical use. Interior decorating, designing clothes or jewelry, making up faces or styling hair, could hold appeal.

Whatever the writer does, it would be difficult for him to keep to a tight or uniform schedule, regardless of standard office procedure. His creative energy comes on at all hours, and it cannot be adjusted to fit someone's idea of the proper work schedule. Because of his own creative personality, the writer is more sympathetic with other artistic people. He understands they cannot turn on creativity like a light switch at nine in the morning and turn it off again at five in the afternoon.

If the writer is not engaged in the arts himself, his intuitive understanding of it would allow him to move easily in artistic circles, if he is so inclined. If he is tied down to a routine job, he should be encouraged to keep busy at something creative in his leisure time.

III. FUNCTIONAL ABILITY

Polarity: GREEN · Average score: 8.4 (High)

Self-confidence

Score: 8/10 - High

The writer is assured and confident in the face of difficult circumstances. He is courageous and faces up to challenges as a matter of course. He assumes authority and inspires confidence in others. He is more self-sufficient and dismisses minor problems as unimportant in the moment. He knows he can handle them if he has to. His confidence is based on his ability to achieve and is in no way held up by, or dependent on, the opinion of others.

The writer is threatened only by very large responsibilities. There is practically nothing he will not tackle, if it is a challenge or just something he thinks he wants to do. He is literally unable to conceive that anything he believes in, including him, can fail. Because of this he works to advantage in situations that call for leadership. He brings out what is best in others. He encourages their self-expression; he gives them confidence in their ability. Where a lesser person would stifle, he stimulates.

The writer functions well in his job because he knows his own strength and potentials. He is released within himself. He has bigger concepts and thinks in bigger terms than most people.

The ability to communicate is influenced by confidence. The writer is not afraid to speak his mind. He is able to accept criticism or different opinions that others may offer. He contributes his own ideas to make his work more efficient and productive. He is willing to apply new techniques to new situations, and he accepts responsibility for the consequences.

The writer has the drive and the enthusiasm necessary to develop his talents. He is assured of his own capabilities. He is willing to take risks to get ahead and confident in his ability to achieve his goals. He has learned that there are few irremediable mistakes, and he regards mistakes as nothing more than a friendly invitation to keep trying, not a loss of approval and prestige, or as a humiliation to be avoided at any cost.

The writer likes strength in others, too, and looks for it. Self-sufficiency in a person is what he admires most.

The writer is not immune to fear. However, a situation has to be very threatening to bring forth a distress reaction from him. When he finally realizes the immensity of a certain challenge, he can be very much afraid. And since he has rarely encountered self-doubt before, he does not know how to handle it. He may be baffled, confused and completely frustrated.

Self-esteem

Score: 9/10 - High

With self-confidence high, the writer is self-reliant, confident and positive. He is progressive, courageous and willing to chance failure in order to achieve success. He is resilient in the face of setbacks. He possesses well-developed leadership qualities.

With self-confidence low, the writer has an exaggerated opinion of himself. Inside himself, he feels that he is really unworthy. Consequently, he overcompensates for his feelings of inadequacy. By creating in his imagination a picture of himself that will impress others and that he can be proud of, he is able to ignore some of the reality of what he truly is. He is good at bluff, often promising more than he can deliver.

Most of the time, the writer gets off to a good start but, unfortunately the promising beginning does not always result in a good finish. He must succeed quickly and in a grand manner in carrying out whatever he has planned or he will suddenly lose interest in the project and decide that it was not “worthwhile.” He does not back up his promises with hard facts and prolonged, lasting effort and subsequently has to pay the price in irritation and embarrassment. He must continually rationalize and distort reality when events demonstrate that he is not, in fact, a superior human being. He becomes very annoyed when someone reminds him of his actions.

Due to his tremendous ego problems, the writer feels the need to always be on top. He is arrogant, patronizing, bossy and careless about the feeling of others. He has an inflated sense of pride in himself, his appearance and his achievements. He wants to be noticed and draw attention to himself. He wants recognition and the respect of others for little real effort on his part. When he does not receive the attention he wants he can become very destructive against those who are receiving the acclaim.

The writer is very interested in how other people's reaction will affect him, personally. He is overly concerned about what others are thinking and saying about him. He brags to cover up his failures or inadequacies. He will do anything rather than lose face. He is egocentric. He behaves as if anything concerning him is of utmost importance, yet he has no interest in other people's lives. He may be generous but only when such a show will earn him the momentary respect of others. He strains to “keep up with the Jones's,” since outside appearances mean so much to him. Things are either good or bad depending on whether they enhance the writer's self-image or detract from it. Whatever strengthens his position becomes desirable and important. On the other hand, what diminishes or detracts from it is undesirable, bad, and to be avoided.

The writer does not do things in his own real interest. His goals are not for his own enjoyment and growth, but rather serve to enhance or magnify his image. Above all, he must maintain his picture of himself as a superior human being.

He has the tendency is to overlook anything “small.” This includes personal relationships as well as vocational challenges. He loses many opportunities to advance himself by belittling the worth of the task, or the people who offer him the job.

Exaggerated pride prevents the writer from asking for help or admitting failure. He hates to admit that he could be wrong and it takes a lot of conflict to humble him enough to seek advice from someone else.

With self-confidence very low, there is conflict. The writer wants to be out in front but is afraid. (This is one reason why some people turn to alcohol, they hope to be able to let themselves go.)

With manipulative or antisocial high, the writer expects to get away with things other people would get caught for.

Personality Integration

Score: 9/10 - High

The writer is a well-balanced individual who is not easily ruffled or disturbed. His behavior is healthy, adjustive and effective. He is resilient and highly functional and his personality is smooth and quite predictable. He is emotionally stable and seldom subject to moods. He is neither unreasonably elated by success nor crushed by failure. He has a healthy measure of self-respect and good inner resources.

The writer feels people are worthwhile and valuable, including himself. He treats himself with dignity and does not belittle or degrade himself. He is mature and growth oriented. He moves steadily toward self-actualization and the higher development of his capacities. He is productive and creative. He does not scatter his energies in the pursuit of prestige or to impress others. He does not allow himself to be diverted from his real goals. His main emphasis is on the development of his own talents and skills.

Confident in his own ability, the writer has well-developed inner resources. He can adjust quickly and smoothly as the circumstances require. He can deal with stress, even that which is directed against his ego. He does not constantly have to seek approval from others to prove that he is worthwhile. He respects his assets and liabilities and is proud of his efforts.

The writer is basically courageous. He does not let himself be pushed around. Without being hostile, he is assertive and defends himself and what is important to him. He seeks new experiences and is open and curious. He can tolerate risks and uncertainty. Above all, he is not afraid to try. If he fails, he usually has learned something from the experience which helps him to do better the next time. He is not devastated by failure. He worries mostly about real problems, not possibilities. He respects dangers but he does not magnify them.

The writer is a realist. He sees things accurately and there is little wishful thinking in his makeup. He respects the limitations of time, energy and resources. Because he knows he cannot do everything, he concentrates on what is important to him.

The writer has developed a set of values that are appropriate for him. He accepts conventional standards when they are suitable. He rejects or modifies them when it is better for him to do so. He neither timidly accepts everything that is being imposed upon him, nor does he reject established standards to prove his independence. What he accepts are now his values and he can live with them and accept responsibility for them.

The writer has self-discipline. It shows in the ability to postpone gratification. He does not have to satisfy all impulses and needs immediately. He has good judgment. He does not make problems complicated, he simplifies them. He can get down to the essentials, to the heart of the matter. He does not get lost in unimportant details and trivial issues. Nor does he expect perfect solutions. He looks for alternatives and picks out a reasonable course of action.

His ability to learn and reason is markedly influenced by the frame of reference he has developed. His assumptions about himself and about the world are fairly consistent with reality; he can adjust his behavior accordingly to meet new demands. He is able to reinterpret situations realistically and see new factors and relationships in it.

The writer is in good contact with his feelings and can express them openly. He does not panic easily. He does not fear losing control of his emotions and can express them in an appropriate manner. He can respond simply and directly to what is going on in the present, whether it be with anger or love. He is very much involved with life. He is natural and spontaneous. He can be himself. He does not have to impress people, submit to them or fight with them. His relations with other people are good. He is compassionate without being sentimental. He is generous and helpful to others.

Integrity

Score: 9/10 - High

The writer follows sound moral principles. He is honest and sincere and conducts himself in a trustworthy and upright manner. He is open, honest and he tells the truth, regardless of consequences to himself. He does not talk around the point. He speaks facts and he is responsible.

The writer is very concerned with accountability and values. He has worked out a set of guidelines that are appropriate for him and he is firmly committed to his own code of ethics. If he does anything less, he feels uneasy and ashamed. He places high value on truth and honesty. He repays loyalty with loyalty. He finds unfair tactics and unethical behavior offensive.

Self-control

Score: 7/10 - High

The writer exercises control over himself, his emotions, desires and deeds. He considers consequences before he goes into action and rarely responds before he has the occasion to think. He does and says what is most effective and efficient in most situations. He is neither prone to hasty judgments nor impetuous acts. His responses are the result of a conscious thought process.

The writer has trained himself to approach situations logically. This has become a habit, and now he functions rationally, working from the head, not the heart. Professionally, this can be an advantage. He appears more objective and self-possessed and his restraint helps him to keep his composure in difficult circumstances. This spares him emotional involvement and allows quicker handling of problem situations. If someone is showing a greater response than he is comfortable with, he may increase his impersonal demeanor and thus signal to others that he does not appreciate what they are trying to accomplish.

The writer's appearance of reserve in emotional circumstances may make him less approachable, as far as other people are concerned. Since his feelings are less likely to show, they are significant when they do surface. Under extreme pressure, he could respond impulsively; however, such action is not his normal response. When it happens, it means that the emotions within him have exploded past his normal control.

IV. INTERPERSONAL RELATIONS

Polarity: GREEN · Average score: 7 (High)

Adaptability

Score: 8/10 - High

The writer is able to change without difficulty so as to conform to new and altered circumstances. He is accommodating and yielding to the desires of others. He adapts to his surroundings by changing his behavior according to the requirements of the situation. He looks at the alternatives, and from those available, picks out a reasonable course of action.

The writer is receptive to outside opinions. He is willing to try the unfamiliar and he will compromise, if that seems the wiser thing to do. He has the ability to revise his attitude in keeping with changing situations in his life. He is easier to live with than a more rigid person. He is slower to become irritated or upset by little things.

The writer would function to advantage in areas where self-directive ability is not an essential requirement for success, such as mail carrying, bakery work, production line work or some jobs in the creative field.

With adaptability very high, the writer is too easily influenced. He is subjective and suffers frequent changes of mood. He takes things at surface value and is uncommitted. His native tendency is to act on feelings rather than facts.

The writer lacks self-directive ability. He tends to pursue various interests and most likely, will let others set his goals for him. He wants to feel that he is part of every new development, every new event or relationship. Others, however, may feel that he is too changeable and cannot be relied upon. They think he is irresponsible when he moves from one kind of experience to another, from one opinion to another. He compromises himself by his lack of mental commitment.

Communication

Score: 7/10 - High

The writer is very sociable, expressive and demonstrative. He is able to communicate his thoughts and feelings openly without the need to resort to indirect forms of intercourse. He takes more time to cover a subject and may even ramble on with words.

The writer is more personal in what he talks about and he can talk freely of even the most personal aspects of his life. He can express openly and directly what goes on in his life in the present, whether it is anger or love. If he feels hurt, he verbalizes his anger right away; he does not get an unexplained headache a day later. He knows he is angry and expresses it appropriately. He does not have to store it up unconsciously until he explodes over a trivial incident. Once his anger is expressed, he is released from the inner pressures that would upset him further.

The writer is not afraid to speak his mind. He is able to accept criticism or different opinions that others may offer. He contributes his own ideas to make his work more efficient and productive. He often interlaces what he has to say with personal examples that enhance his communication. He is easily puzzled and upset with others who are more close-mouthed and reticent.

The writer is willing to stand up for his views and he will clear up misunderstandings, even though the result might be detrimental to him. He believes that a healthy degree of friction between people leads to better communication, better understanding, and mutual respect.

The writer is well qualified as public speaker, teacher, entertainer, or sales person.

Interpersonal Involvement

Score: 8/10 - High

The writer has a strong need for constantly being surrounded by people. He has the urge to form friendships with the people he likes. He actively seeks the company of others. He is informal and easy to meet. No one seems a stranger to him. People stimulate him to think and feel. He enjoys social gatherings and derives a sense of security from group support. Given the choice, he will be with people every time. Working with inanimate objects or information may be a problem.

The writer likes people who are warm and quick to show their feelings. He is uncomfortable with individuals who are cold and detached, as they do not meet his need for closeness and affinity. His family and his friends mean a lot to him. He needs to be near them geographically, at least part of the time. He may get involved on impulse and his emotional needs are such that he may intrude even where he is not wanted.

The writer is unable to work or perform well without others with him or at least being near. He is lonesome and despondent when denied the company of others of like mind. His need to associate may be especially intense when feeling anxious or upset. He expects support from others and finds it difficult to stand alone. He is a more sympathetic appearing person, and he is moved by the troubles of others, just as he is by his own.

The writer shows little discrimination in relationships. He reacts immediately to another person. He is readily accessible and less formal in style. He is familiar in tone, language and attitude. He becomes acquainted so easily and with so many people that he classifies everyone he meets as his friend. In the office or on the job, he might spend a great deal of time visiting and talking to other employees rather than doing his work.

With this writer, others can almost always count on the conversation taking a personal trend.

His attitude would be valuable in professions such as nursing, reception work, teaching, the healing arts, service organizations, and anywhere where he must deal with the public in a service related way.

Friendliness

Score: 6/10 - Moderate

Most of the time, the writer is friendly and consistent in his emotional reaction to people. On the job, he is pleasant but matter-of-fact. He shows that he has manners and good taste. He is friendly without being personal. And he expects others to be businesslike, too. He gets along best with people who think equally purposefully.

The writer may have self-protective feelings in some areas that may cause him to pull back under certain circumstances.

Empathy

Score: 6/10 - Moderate

When the writer's defense system does not interfere, he is empathetic. He can feel with others and put himself into their place. Sometimes, he is too taken up with his own affairs to be able to sense how others are reacting. He believes in paying for what he receives. He also believes in just monetary return for whatever services he renders.

V. PRODUCTIVITY

Polarity: GREEN · Average score: 7.8 (High)

Determination To Succeed

Score: 7/10 - High

The writer is result oriented. Once he decides on a goal, he follows through and keeps moving until he attains it. He stays with what he is trying to accomplish. He even thrives in adverse surroundings. He makes a commitment and perseveres despite temporary doubts or personal limitations. He has the ability to let go of something that paralyzes so many people – insistence on the guarantee of the desired outcome. He proceeds instead with the conviction that he will grow with the demands and will be “big enough” to meet the challenge.

The writer does not have to be prodded. He moves forward because of an inner desire to get the job done. He stays away from mental considerations that bring him into defeat. Only positive pictures are allowed to stay in his mind. He keeps moving regardless of how he feels in the moment. When he is faced with an obstacle, he takes it as an opportunity and tries to find alternative means to finish what he has set out to do.

Vocationally, the writer's attitude is an asset. It enables him to succeed in whatever field he has chosen. He finds it painful to do superficial work. He is likewise distressed when others do not finish the job according to his measure of completion.

To others, his sense of commitment may appear ruthless. He seems to be thinking only of his goals and often creates opportunities at the expense of others. He uses others’ services to further his own interests. To him, the end justifies the means.

Vocationally, the writer serves well in the healing arts, in emergency situations, in the military, or in political and financial enterprises. Other suitable occupations are engineering, law, architecture, and most types of investigative work.

With self-confidence low, determination enables the writer to move forward no matter how inadequate he may feel inside. Others may be amazed to learn that his confidence is low because of the accomplishments he has achieved. He may continue to have doubts about himself, but he still keeps his focus forward on his goals.

Physical Energy

Score: 7/10 - High

The writer has a great deal of physical energy. He has the strength to sustain long hours of work and maintain high performance, even under stress. During prolonged or arduous tasks, he remains relatively calm and competent. He may set a fast pace for others because he, himself, has so much stamina. He is naturally active. To others it may appear that his physical nature governs his whole personality. He is quickly aroused and involved physically. He enjoys doing physical things. His initial response to anything is usually on the bodily level and he will take action to work something out.

The writer is a matter-of-fact individual. He is concerned with the realistic areas of life. With this pragmatic bent of mind he is good at taking knowledge and turning it into useful application. He has the energy and the drive to put his ideas into action. Usually, he simplifies complicated information to deal with it more effectively.

The writer is built for continuing physical action. He needs active manual labor to use up his strength. If unreleased, the pent-up energy turns into restlessness. He functions to advantage where physical action is the key to success. His body is ordinarily in better shape to take the demands he places on it. He is usually interested in sports, endurance contests, tests of stamina or hard manual labor. Jobs such as lumbering, mining, carrying mail by foot, excavating, construction work, road building and handling of freight would be ideal.

Progressiveness

Score: 8/10 - High

The writer favors progress and seeks continuing improvement. He moves forward and onward toward desirable results. His focus is outward on the new. He is courageous and thinks ahead rather than back to the past. He adapts to new people, locations and situations painlessly.

The writer is the kind of individual who builds from the ground up and gets wrapped up in his career and projects. If he has a choice of jobs, he will often deliberately take the one that offers a risk. He prefers to be engaged in work where he can employ his flair for devising novel methods and inventing and not just maintaining or conserving. He is ingenious and likes to put forward new options. He is a natural innovator and not afraid to risk his reputation for the implementation of progressive concepts.

The writer has a strong desire for self development and attainment of personal goals. His conviction is that he is going to make the future what he wants it to be. He focuses his energy on the plans and actions required to exceed himself. He is willing to evolve and grow in order to be “better than he ever was.” Inwardly, he feels secure. He may be faced with frustration or conflicts, but he has the power to go ahead anyway. He is able to achieve innovative and satisfying results, not just once or twice but repeatedly. He gives himself a chance of achieving at peak performance and maintaining this level once he gets there.

The writer is innovative and creative and possesses a special ability for devising more efficient ways of handling the work load. He will deliberately try a different way of doing something rather than use a tried and trusted process. He is not prepared to be a slave to outmoded ideas, nor does he adhere to tradition for the sake of custom. He has to see a good reason for continuing to use established procedures. He prefers to work with new concepts and preferably new materials. He thinks in terms of building the new rather than conserving the old. He dislikes working with leftovers and reusing materials, as a general rule. He may show little concern with time, cost, or where the money is coming from.

The writer will not be content without some expansion, however minor. There may be no dramatic sweeping changes, and progress may be made one step at a time. He may build gradually, without flash or fanfare, but he will develop and build. His greatest satisfaction comes from improving what went before and this is what he aims to do in his work and his life. Once he has planted himself in a position where he can build higher, he moves forward with confidence.

The writer is willing to contemplate the viewpoints of other people while retaining the ability to generate his own. He sees himself, and people in general, as the basic natural resource and acts with confidence that human beings are capable of much more than defending the status quo.

If he encounters obstacles, the writer is unlikely to give in to anger or despair. He responds with purposeful activity and focuses on transforming the stumbling blocks into stepping-stones. No matter how rough it gets, he always feels that he can do something about it. He is able to use a lesson learned from failure constructively in seeking future success. He takes setbacks as signs that it is time to correct course. He is willing to make the necessary changes in his habits of mind and work, so that more satisfying results will be produced the next time. He sees the ability to correct course as a necessity in fulfilling his goals. He anticipates and adapts to major change while maintaining momentum within the overall plan.

The writer can take constructive criticism. He accepts it when it is justified and ignores it when it is not.

He sees himself differently from other people. He is setting new norms. He focuses carefully on what he needs in order to excel. He does this by thinking carefully about what he wants, how and in the future, choosing the most important goals, ruling out those that are for him too easy or too risky. He determines what he truly cares about and then devotes himself to that pursuit.

The writer is bound by no preconceived limitations. He has the ability to reach for what could be, and to rise above his fears. He knows how to act decisively when opportunity presents itself. He has the ability to start many things on his own and he has the drive to put his ideas into action.

The writer has a deep commitment to his goals. He feels that what he is doing is the result of his own free choice. He is doing it because he wants to do it, and the consequences of his activities will be valuable to him.

He is inclined to get wrapped up in his career and projects. He is the doer and less the enjoyer. He is likely to miss meals and does not consistently take care of his own health. (He is probably a poor housekeeper.)

The writer functions best in situations that challenge his mind to unfold. He is unhappy with dull, mundane detail work. He would be happier as an efficiency expert in charge of trouble shooting than being forced into the confining mold of a nine-to-five position, no matter how fancy the title. If there is a bottleneck somewhere in the production line, he can be depended on to come up with a workable solution. “Anything can be improved on.” is his motto and he will be happiest in a job where he can experiment and test his ideas in different and dynamic ways. An employer will not find him edgy or peeking at the clock around five o'clock. He will willingly put in extra hours if necessary, or if there is an exciting project under way. And with his progressive schemes and original plans, he may double the companies profit and lower its overhead.

Progressiveness is desirable for work as an engineer, draftsman, architect, builder of all kinds, shop foreman, mechanic, designer or artist.

With progressiveness very high, the writer may be extravagant in his demands for new materials. He prefers to work with the new when what is at hand would serve as well. In this sense he is wasteful. He is so interested in producing something innovative that he overlooks the cost of production, the demand, and the profit margin. He focuses so much on the new that he fails to appreciate older, worthwhile concepts and ideas.

With physical energy high, the writer is a lover of action and motion. He likes activity for himself and is interested in anything that moves, such as automobiles, railways, printing presses, steam shovels and airplanes. He is interested in agriculture, and in such activities as exploring, building and aviation. With physical energy low, the writer usually will start more than he can finish. In his complete involvement with the project, he may overlook his own creature comforts and allow himself to become run down.

Resourcefulness

Score: 8/10 - High

"The writer is able to deal promptly and effectively with difficulties. He has the ability for effective brainstorming and the potential for finding options and alternatives in the absence of normal resources. He envisions innovative solutions to problems and makes useful contributions to his line of work. He can find ways to improve almost anything.

The writer is a good associative thinker. He deals easily with various kinds of situations. If there is a solution to the problem, he can be counted on to find it and he is capable of offering answers that will be quite original.

The writer is adept in the art of mental replay and has a built-in ability to deal with emergencies. He can meet a crisis swiftly. He mentally reviews what worked in the past and then applies the solution to present problems.

The writer uses his imagination in a practical way to improve upon tangible things. He may streamline existing work methods for more efficiency or find a new use for existing things. He may envision how to change the form and shape of products, how to package them more attractively, or how to market more seductively. He is an excellent person to have on the payroll because he can find many ways to keep costs down. If there is a suggestion box around, he will drop in many unique, workable ideas.

There are few situations that the writer cannot deal with. He is flexible and adaptable when working things out. He appreciates the usefulness of others' creative ideas and will probably throw in a few promotional schemes of his own.

The writer would be well suited for work as a designer, advertiser, architect, sales person, efficiency expert or trouble shooter."

Organization

Score: 9/10 - High

The writer is well organized and excels in planning strategy. He has a flair for organization, for handling numbers of people and projects. Time, materials and place are all important to him. He is never more satisfied than when they all form a harmonious whole of which he is the center. Efficiency and order have tremendous appeal to him.

Once he has made plans, he carries them out methodically. He budgets his hours so well that he gets much done in a relatively short period of time. He knows exactly how much time should be allotted to different tasks. When he makes a commitment to be somewhere at a certain hour, he is there. If he says he will have a task completed by a certain date, others can rely on him.

The writer derives satisfaction from systematic accomplishment and he plans efficiently and effortlessly. His greatest satisfaction is to put everything neatly in its place, and he tries to accomplish this in every department of his life. He makes and stays with schedules and may list in writing at the start of the day what he wants to accomplish. He assembles his materials for a given task before he actually commences work. The extra time spent in planning saves him many hours in preventing hit-or-miss starts and retracing his steps later on.

He has a keen feeling for the organization of situations and projects. He has a strong sense of order and a feeling for the natural progression of events. He comprehends projects in their entirety and knows the significance of each component part. He has the ability to make segments work in consonance with each other and integrates them into one efficient whole. He feels where each part goes to build the complete project.

The writer has little patience with schedules that are wasteful or procedures that lack efficiency. He will rearrange office or business systems to make sure that the organization runs with sensible proficiency.

His sense of time and involvement with organizational detail is applied to the management of people as well. However, as soon as the human element enters the picture, the task becomes more difficult. People are not satisfied to be assigned a slot like pieces of machinery. He must bring into play considerable management ability. He must plan time and space for them with careful observance of personal considerations.

If the writer has spare time, he uses it productively and he expects others to imitate him.

The writer enjoys activities that require intricate planning. With his ability to handle and organize people, equipment and materials, he would fit well into a position where he constructs a whole organization. He would be excellent in planning within a large corporation. Whatever he does, he would function best in directing active, growing projects.

VI. STRESS VULNERABILITY

Polarity: RED · Average score: 2.6 (Moderate)

Antisocial

Score: 3/10 - Moderate

With other scores in the “Vulnerability To Stress” syndrome low, the writer has good coping ability and is able to remain functional and effective under stress.

With other scores in the “Vulnerability To Stress” syndrome high, the writer still will not display criminal, dishonest or illegal behavior under stress. He will use other defenses to cope with the strain.

Unpredictability

Score: 3/10 - Moderate

The writer is predictable and stable. He is emotionally mature and has a fair sense of duty. He is persevering and uses his abilities, whether meager or ample, in productive activities. He uses good judgment. He looks at the facts and accepts reality as it is. He believes that problems can be worked out logically.

The writer thinks and acts in conformity with standards that are acceptable to him and to the society in which he lives. He finds many things set up to his advantage in the way of standard arrangements, procedures and routines.

The writer is loyal and dependable. He is careful and reliable in all areas of his life. He examines carefully the circumstances that may affect a decision or behavior. He chooses a judicious course of action and so avoids failure and disaster. Usually, he delays decisions until he has examined all possible ramifications of a project or relationship.

The writer may or may not be subjective. If he is, it will not affect his performance. Subjectivity would be more related to interpersonal relationships.

Important! Other traits in the stress syndrome may modify the findings in this trait.

Manipulative

Score: 3/10 - Moderate

The writer has the ability to meet the demands of life effectively without resorting to manipulative behavior.

He is realistic in appraising his reactions and abilities and in interpreting what is going on in the world around him. He does not wrongly perceive what others say and do. He evaluates his capabilities in a realistic manner without hiding important feelings and motives from himself. He conforms or fails to conform to social norms, but the decision is a voluntary one rather than the result of uncontrollable impulses.

The writer has the ability to establish constructive associations. He is comfortable with other people and able to react spontaneously during social interchange. At the same time, he does not feel obligated to subjugate his opinions to the group.

He is able to form close and satisfying personal relationships and can love someone other than himself. He is sensitive to others' needs and does not make excessive demands for the gratification of his own desires.

He is able to handle everyday situations, including his own emotional upsets, without excessive stress and without resorting to inappropriate behavior. He can work regularly, think clearly, manage his emotions, and keep on relatively good terms with most people, including himself.

Hysterical (excessive response)

Score: 2/10 - Low

The writer remains calm in the face of emergencies or under stress. He is able to think clearly and behaves logically. He is able to weigh alternatives and choose the most appropriate response. (Other scores are important; stress may bring out another entirely different illogical response.)

Tension

Score: 2/10 - Low

The writer's disposition is normally calm and pleasant. He is not easily ruffled or disturbed. He can handle a good deal of stress without his functioning ability becoming impaired. He is able to handle everyday demands and situations without excessive strain. The higher the troubles pile up, the more strength he finds to bear them. Emergencies don't throw him off balance. He handles them with calm efficiency and a crisis brings out the best in him. He is dependable under pressure and can help others to overcome their panic and hysteria. Even when situations reach the crisis point, he manages to keep his cool and carries on efficiently as though nothing unusual were happening.

The writer has a sense of well-being and functions effectively in life. He takes things and situations as they come. He seldom gets uptight over anything. He is relaxed and adaptable. He looks at the facts and accepts reality as it is. He believes that most problems can be worked out logically. The writer respects the limitations of time, energy and resources without becoming uptight. Because he knows he cannot do everything, he concentrates on what is important to him. He does not get lost in unimportant details nor does he expect perfect solutions. He looks for alternatives and picks out a reasonable course of action. The writer is in good contact with his own feelings and can express them openly. He knows when he is angry and reacts appropriately. He can respond simply and directly to what is going on at the present, whether it be with anger or with love. He is very much involved with life. He is natural and spontaneous and can be himself. His relations with other people are good. (With low scores in motivation or self-control, the writer may be too lax to pay attention to deadlines and commitments.)

Polarity: RED · Average score: 2.4 (Low)

Passive Dependent

Score: 2/10 - Low

The writer is an individual with a firm identity. He sees himself accurately and is accepting of himself. He takes responsibility for his own life and for the fulfillment of his needs. He knows where he is and where he is going. He sets his own course and continues to expand and grow as an individual. He is competent in handling his life and his environment. He makes up his own mind. He is independent rather than leaning and dependent.

The writer will stand up for his own rights if necessary. Freedom to do things his own way is one of his goals in life. He appreciates people who share his belief in the importance of each person doing his or her thing. He avoids the tendency to complain as a way of getting attention and sympathy. He talks about things which inspire others and lets them know how he enjoys life. He gets actively engaged in projects and tasks. He does not expect others to solve his difficulties. He deals purposefully with problems. He distinguishes between that which can be changed and that which must be endured. He maintains a sense of personal worth, even in defeat.

Withdrawal

Score: 2/10 - Low

The writer is emotionally secure and is willing to try unfamiliar things. He loves to explore new areas and exciting relationships. He actively seeks the company of others. He is informal and makes others feel at ease, too. He enjoys being familiar with others and is accessible to friendly overtures.

The writer is more communicative. He talks with greater freedom about personal things. He does not look upon other people's personal questions as an intrusion into his private affairs. Their interest in him gives him a sense of being involved.

The writer's attitude would be valuable in professions such as nursing, reception work, teaching, the healing arts, service organizations, domestic help, and in any area where he must deal with the public in a service related way.

Suspicion

Score: 2/10 - Low

The writer is inclined to trust others automatically. He is too easily taken in because he assumes that what is being said by a person in authority is true. Even with years of experience of being embarrassed for having believed someone foolishly, the writer is still vulnerable. He keeps believing people who have won his confidence. His problem is that he does not know when and when not to trust.

The writer automatically has faith in what looks right to him. He accepts the new with less reservation and is willing to give it at least a try. Such credulity augments the effect of high empathy, involvement and impulsiveness. It makes it harder for the writer to direct these traits.

The writer fits well into fields where “taking things for granted” is acceptable, such as production line work, mail carrying, bakery work, and some creative and artistic fields.

Pessimism

Score: 2/10 - Low

The writer is optimistic. He usually feels good about people and circumstances. Part of his strength comes from inborn cheerfulness. His positive attitude is reflected in his expression. Others will seek him out because he is an inspiration and they can depend upon him to cheer them up. He will do less complaining about unexpected impediments. He generally looks on the brighter side of things and expects them to work out in the end.

The writer has initiative and feels optimistic about life in general. He is more progressive and happy about himself, his work and what he is accomplishing. He focuses on the goals ahead, not on how he feels along the way. He is aware of positive possibilities in other people, in himself, and in the circumstances around him.

Fears

Score: 4/10 - High

The writer with fears may be afraid of ridicule, loneliness, criticism, rejection, etc. These fears are often caused by emotional insecurity and by emotional deprivation of one kind or another.

Fears can be activated in many situations and under many conditions.
A writer's particular fears and what effect they have on him will be explored in this section.

For trait descriptions: Go to the individual indicators and look them up alphabetically.

VIII. PROBLEM AREAS

Polarity: RED · Average score: 1.8 (Low)

Nervous restlessness

Score: 2/10 - Low

The writer is calm and inwardly controlled. He is able to take most situations in stride and has a good amount of patience. A frightening or tension-arousing situation has no or little negative effect on him. He is able to stay relaxed and remains functioning. His physical and mental energy is usually good.

The writer is less excited by change. He will not take risks because he feels easily overwhelmed. He prefers to deal with familiar things and conventional methods. He can live and work contentedly without excitement and diversity. He stays closer to home and clings to his lifestyle. He is satisfied with routine activities. The writer is most comfortable using proven methods. He is not likely to experiment with unfamiliar ways of doing things.

The writer would perform best where excitement and change are not part of the daily routine. He would work reliably as a bookkeeper, bank teller, claim examiner, loan counselor, housekeeper or machine operator.

Inhibitions

Score: 1/10 - Low

The writer is able to function independently. He has a realistic view of himself. He faces life's situations squarely, without avoidance or much realization. He establishes constructive relationships with other people. He is able to release his inner resources and potentialities without indulging in compensating behavior. He is free of disabling symptoms such as severe tension or anxiety, and he is unhampered by serious inner conflicts.

Conflicts

Score: 1/10 - Low

The writer handles life with composure and inward calm. He has few frustrating desires or impulses that are opposing each other. The conflicts he feels he is able to deal with directly, thereby eliminating the cause.

The writer is well organized. He works carefully and efficiently. He functions reliably under pressure. He is orderly and stable. He feels at ease with himself and comfortable with other people. He is content with his goals and with the direction in which his life is going.

Anxiety

Score: 2/10 - Low

The writer is basically courageous and deals with circumstances as they arise. He may not like a certain situation but he accepts it as it is, and in so doing, he has control over what to do and how to respond.

The writer accepts occasional failure as part of the growing process. He tries to understand what went wrong so that he can learn from the experience. Most importantly, he gives himself credit for trying.

The writer feels deeply, whether it is sadness or joy, love, anger, frustration, hunger or fatigue. He is not usually in doubt how he feels and he is not afraid to express his feelings openly.

The writer is able to face his problems directly. He admits to doubts and fears that make him uneasy. He sees danger in the proper perspective without exaggerating it. He solves conflicts by actively dealing with the cause and the anxiety associated with it. He realizes that everyone is subject to fear now and then and that it is better to share his apprehension with others rather than keep it to himself. His relations with other people are good. He is capable of loving and giving love in full measure.

Confusion

Score: 3/10 - Moderate

The writer is well organized. He is a logical and objective thinker who plans his life and his activities efficiently. What he expresses is the result of conscious thought. His ideas flow systematically and he has the ability to concentrate. He has self-directive ability and can apply himself fully to his tasks.
